Austrian economics takes another step forward in Australia

I was recently made aware of the existence of a course unit at the University of Notre Dame, Western Australia, on the 'The History of Austrian Economics' (thanks to Ron Manners for pointing this out to me).

Given that Austrian economic teaching in Australia traditionally tended to be subsumed within broader history of economic thought courses, the availability of a dedicated course unit on Austrian economics is a welcome step forward for the discipline in this country.

It would be remiss of me to not mention that the course is funded by the Mannkal Economic Education Foundation, which is a great supporter of free-market causes in Australia. So, I think students who take up the course are very lucky indeed, given that previous generations of Austrian economic scholars in this country either received minimal training through university courses or had to teach themselves.
